In 1905, New York passed a law limiting the hours of work per week for bakers to 60. This law was challenged by Joseph Lochner, a bakery owner, who argued that it violated his freedom of contract protected by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

Legal Arguments

The case reached the Supreme Court, where it sparked heated debate over the scope of government's power to regulate economic activity. The majority opinion, written by Justice Rufus Peckham, held that the New York law was unconstitutional.

The Court reasoned that the law deprived Lochner of his liberty to contract without due process of law. The Court argued that the law was not necessary to protect the health of bakers and that it interfered with their freedom to pursue their livelihood.

The dissenting justices argued that the law was a legitimate exercise of the state's police power to protect the health and welfare of its citizens. They emphasized the need for government to regulate economic activity to prevent the exploitation of workers.

Impact and Legacy

Lochner v. New York had a profound impact on American law and society. The decision established a strict limit on the government's ability to regulate economic activity, known as "substantive due process." This doctrine allowed businesses to challenge government regulations that they believed interfered with their freedom of contract.

The decision also weakened the power of labor unions and made it more difficult for workers to negotiate fair working conditions. It took decades for the Lochner doctrine to be overturned, and its legacy continues to be debated today.
